is able and conciliatory. We trust it will serve at least to facilitate a speedy and rightful adjustment of our troubles. "In the terms of the plan proposed by Mr. Crittenden, or Mr. Rice, or Mr. Corwin," says the National Intelligencer, "there are surely the materials out of which may be constructed a basis of adjustment that shall save the country from the total ruin with which it is menaced. Let not North ern apathy strike hands with Southern violence in precipitating the overthrow of the Republic, but let the patriotic of all sections join hear and hand in constant and earnest efforts to stay the progress of the feud which is plaguing the whole land, groaning under present evils made only more portentous by the omens of intimate quite clearly, that, if the Legislature fail to call a State Convention for the passage of an Ordinance of Secession; reledition and civil war in the State shall be the consequence.

The idea, the threat, of these organs is, that, if the people's elected representatives refuse to adopt measures for taking Kentucky out of the Union, the friends of Secession will inaugurate a revolation in the midst of our people for accomplishing the purpose at all hazards. They are trying to seare, to frighten, to, to bully, to coerce the General Assembly by the threat that a lawless mob will rise up and take possession of the State Government.

We have no apprehension, however, that the General Assembly, poor, as our opinion may be of a portion of its materials, can be thus intimidated and dragooned. If any of the traitors among us think that they can, by anarchical and tumultuary movement, seize wpon the substitute of the convention and the prevent a turbulent and excited majority from the purpose of asset of the Constitution it with resource the substitute of the Constitution it will resource the substitute of the Constitution it will recovered the substitute of the constitution of the Constitution it will recovered the substitute of the constitution of the Constitution it will recovered the substitute of the constitution of the Constitutio
